

Ashley B. Coffield

Ashley B. Coffield, MPA, is Principal Fellow with Partnership for Prevention, a non-profit health policy research organization in Washington DC. She has enjoyed nearly 14 years with Partnership for Prevention, formerly serving as its President. She is currently directing Partnership for Prevention's activities in the areas of chlamydia screening and sexual health. Ms. Coffield has developed and applied evidence-based methods for comparing the health benefits and cost effectiveness of clinical preventive services, co-authoring nine peer-reviewed research articles and numerous reports on the topic. For eight years, Ms. Coffield staffed the National Commission on Prevention Priorities—a 20-member advisory group previously chaired by former U.S. Surgeon General Dr. David Satcher—which guides Partnership for Prevention and HealthPartners Research Foundation's health and economic analyses. Ms. Coffield has also directed Partnership for Prevention's education and advocacy efforts on Capitol Hill, managed Board of Directors' committees, and served as Partnership's spokesperson. She has previously been active in the areas of Medicare and immunization policy, insurance coverage for preventive services, and translating evidence-based recommendations into public health policy and practice.

Ms. Coffield previously worked as director of the Washington DC office of the New York-based Center for Children's Health and the Environment and as a policy analyst for the Office of Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and for the Public Health Foundation. Ms. Coffield graduated magna cum laude from Rhodes College and received her MPA from Texas A&M University. She lives in Memphis, Tennessee with her husband and two children.
